In order to evaluate the influence of new diagnostic procedures and intra-operative findings on the management of patients with carcinoma of the bladder, the records of 310 patients treated for bladder carcinoma at the Department of Urology of the University of Padua between 1970 and 1983 have been retrospectively analyzed. In 240 patients a radical cystectomy, intravesical chemotherapy and/or irradiation was performed and 40 were treated by simple transurethral resection of the bladder. Cystoscopy is often performed for various reasons. In this series it has been used as a standard method for all patients. Cystoscopy has allowed to detect bladder tumors which had escaped preoperative radiographic examination and has revealed unsuspected lesions (including metastasis) in some cases. In selected cases, the usefulness of cystoscopy has been demonstrated also in the follow-up of patients with a history of bladder carcinoma. Intra-operative transvesical tumor biopsy is an accurate method for obtaining material for histologic examination. It has to be considered, however, that biopsies are more suitable for the detection of lesions of a superficial nature and may lead to some complications (ureteral laceration, intrapelvic haemorrhage). Percutaneous biopsy of suspicious intrapelvic lesions has to be performed with extreme caution. It should be performed with ultrasonography guidance and only after general anesthesia and a selective arteriography of the lower limbs. The yield of this method is rather low. In our experience it has been used mainly in the follow-up of patients after transurethral resection of the bladder and intravesical chemotherapy. Ultrasonography has been found to be a useful diagnostic method in some patients. It has to be considered, however, that it is only a screening method which should be used in a selected group of patients. A correlation between preoperative ultrasonographic findings and intra-operative and histologic findings has 4bc0debe42
