The suggestion that any god (or gods) must necessarily "exist" comes from the belief that to "exist" is to "do something," and to "do something" is necessarily to be. God is not a concept. God is a set of rules that everyone "knows" about. People have their own ideas of what God is because they learned this from their parents and in the culture they grew up in. The Bible is a collection of literature, not a "moral philosophy" but the instructions that, at the time, went along with the common cultural understandings. And thus, the people at the time understood how to grow up in, and behave in, a family. A divine being, if it existed at all, would have to make some noise if it wanted us to notice it, but if God is out there, we would not know it. We might find physical evidence of our god, but it is highly unlikely that evidence would be found in our civilization if it really exists. If our bodies look like the bodies from the Bible, and we don't find bones or organs that look like parts of a supercomputer, it is a very good bet that our bodies are not made of atoms.
