Download the. Does intranasal corticosteroid therapy cause cortical thinning? A surface-based morphometric MRI study.

A common side effect of intranasal corticosteroids (INs) is adverse local reactions to the mucosa. Reports of cortical thinning in the hippocampi of patients using INs have recently been presented, but the effect on the cerebral cortex of INNs has not yet been investigated. The aim of this study was to investigate whether INN use is associated with cortical thinning. The study was a cross-sectional case-control study, using magnetic resonance imaging and automated cortical segmentation to assess cortical thickness in the prefrontal, orbitofrontal, temporal and occipital lobes of 32 patients with INN-induced adverse local reactions and 38 healthy subjects matched for age, sex and handedness. Cortical thickness (CT) was measured using manual segmentation of a 3D surface-based model of the cortical gray matter. CT was expressed as a percentage of the total intracranial volume. Data were statistically analyzed using multivariate analysis.

Cortical thickness was significantly reduced in INS users compared with healthy control subjects in the right prefrontal, orbitofrontal, temporal and occipital lobes. Cortical thinning associated with INS use was present after correction for age, sex and intracranial volume. INS use is associated with cortical thinning in the prefrontal, orbitofrontal and temporal lobes of INS users. Cortical thinning is reversible after discontinuation of INS therapy. The observed cortical changes are consistent with the pattern of clinical symptoms induced by INS therapy in patients with postnasal discharge, nasal obstruction, facial or oral edema and pain. 6d1f23a050
